

The Children's Corner

The Song of a Hat

A toadie, a toadie,
I made a fine hat
Of standard and pie-crust
With plenty of fat.

I trimmed it with parsley
And bottles of ink
And several pieces
From an old kitchen sink.

I trimmed it with marbles
And pieces of glass
And half of the lace
Of a last summer's shoe.

I trimmed it with turnips
And pieces of chalk,
And then put it on
And went out for a walk.

Happy Moon Legends

Strong Heart's Anger.

There was a time, O Little-ones,
When the moon was angry,
And the leaves of the maple tree
Were green all the year round.

The warriors met in a forest
For a long time, but they
Did not fight, for the moon
Was angry and the leaves
Were green.

The warriors met in a forest
For a long time, but they
Did not fight, for the moon
Was angry and the leaves
Were green.

Our Trip West

By Mrs. Agnes Fuller Benson

September 11th we left Oklahoma and entered the panhandle of Texas, the high plains. Cattle were everywhere, and miles and miles of wire fences bordered the roads. At the cross-roads the road ran over railroad rails "cattle guards", while at the side was a gate to open for the passage of teams and stock. The country was gently rolling, but far enough so we could see the road for miles ahead and often guessed how far it was to some point we could see—never over guessed and usually fell short, though Paul, used to the clear air, made some close estimates.

Again it was Sunday and the towns were quiet, but at roadside stand run by two old-timers in ten-gallon hats and with the true Texas drawl, we got a most delicious watermelon which fully upheld Paul's assertion that Texas raises the best melons. At another small place we stopped for gas and everybody at the station came out when they saw the license-plate, among them a small Texan of some four years whose eye caught sight of the basket and its contents, said he, "You ain't got your little old car right along with you, ain't you? Ah-ha!" Off to each side of the road we could see widely scattered clumps of trees and the fans of windmills. There were usually several miles from the highway, and wherever there was a railroad town there were stockyards and chutes for loading. The roads were good.

We saw our first tarantula walking down the middle of the road and the size of a large dog. It was very big and intentionally hit the corner of the shell of a land tortoise causing him to turn cartwheels. Where Kansas gave us miles of roadside sunflowers, Texas gave us tumble-weeds, gnarled cedars in the breaks, wood, and stunted cedars in the breaks. And here with towns farther apart the hitchhikers which we had seen all along the way, beginning in Maine with a father, mother, and infant in a baby-buggy bearing the sign "BEP", became more noticeable.

Several times we saw men poking over boxes and papers left in the ditch by lumberjacks, evidently looking for something to eat. We passed one family of four, including a little girl, and saw a baby of a few months, the father burdened with a big suitcase and package, the little girl with a package, and the mother with the baby in her arms. Later they passed us, riding much more comfortably than they could have done on their own. And still later we passed them walking again and offered to take the mother, baby and baggage as far as the next town, but they felt they rather stay together.
